Harrison Ford and Helen Mirren star in "1923," which begins streaming Sunday on Paramount+.

'1923' offers another prelude to 'Yellowstone'

As it expands once more, the "Yellowstone" franchise is looking to the past ... again.

The new show's title offers sufficient proof. "1923" starts its run Sunday, Dec. 18, on Paramount+, with Harrison Ford (in his first continuing series part) and Oscar, Primetime Emmy and Tony winner Helen Mirren as Jacob and Cara Dutton, who head another division of the family that also is central to "Yellowstone" and its first prequel show, "1883." The relatives face such plights as illness and drought as they try to edge into then-modern times. The Taylor Sheridan-created series has a second season of eight episodes, the same length as Season 1, already ordered.

Being filmed principally in Montana, "1923" is "a wonderful adventure" in Mirren's view. "I'd never been to Montana before, so that's been a revelation," the actress says. "I knew it was impossibly beautiful, but the size and the variety of it is extraordinary. Doing this kind of story in this kind of landscape, where they are intrinsically tied together, is an amazing experience. The geography of America has always fascinated me, and these (characters) are dealing with all the glories and difficulties inherent in that."

The large cast of "1923" also includes James Badge Dale ("24") as John Dutton Sr., plus Timothy Dalton, Robert Patrick, Jennifer Ehle, Darren Mann ("Animal Kingdom"), Brandon

Sklenar ("Mapplethorpe"), Marley Shelton, Brian Geraghty ("Big Sky") and Jerome Flynn ("Game of Thrones"). Mirren reports that rather than being detailed about her role at the outset, creator-producer Sheridan gave her "a sense of, 'Do you want to come on this ride?' We don't know where the ride's going to take us, and I found that really interesting and exciting."

Mirren first worked with Ford in the 1986 movie "The Mosquito Coast." She recalls that as "a great time, then we went off and did other things and lived a whole life, really. There's been a connection that has never been lost, though ... so when we came together again, there was an incredible sense of familiarity and affection and history. That's invaluable if you're playing husband and wife."

Though Mirren won two of her Emmys for "Prime Suspect" mysteries, she doesn't consider those as series in the same way "1923" is.

"I've never done something like this before," she maintains. "With 'Prime Suspect,' we would do one four-hour story about every two years, so it was more like a miniseries. It wasn't something ongoing like this is, though how far we'll go is a mystery to me. I have to say that Taylor is an extraordinary writer; this springs with such complexity, but at the same time, it's incredibly accessible. It's not high-falutin', but very playable, great writing."

There's plenty of information here to help the home cook be successful and Berry says it all starts where every project does.

"It's all about organization and planning," she says. "Once you know how many guests are coming, sit down and choose the recipes, make your lists, pre-order some things like your turkey. You don't want to run out of foil or coffee, for instance, so make sure you stock up but with the right amounts – don't over-order."

"Then on the morning of the big day, it's lovely to plan your seating plan so that people enjoy each other's company, and dress the table well. I like to think of it like a play, a performance."

Of course, in a challenging economy where everything is more expensive this year, putting on a Christmas dinner can be financially challenging. But there are ways of keeping costs down, says Berry, such as sticking to a shopping list and not over-buying.

"For example, think about if you need lots of different sweetmeats or cheeses," she says. "Just one or two lovely varieties is fine. You don't need lots of chocolates, a taste is good Also, do accept help to keep the costs down. If your guests offer to bring the pudding or some chocolates or contribute to some wine, it's lovely to agree."

And if people come into the kitchen, Berry says don't be shy about accepting help.

"I love people in the kitchen ...," she says. "There are always last-minute jobs like preparing the sprouts, stirring the gravy or finishing the canapes, setting the table or the name places. I love to give people a job to do if they offer."

“From the Ashes” (Dec. 23)

From National Geographic and director Michael Bonfiglio (“Paris to Pittsburgh,” “George Carlin’s American Dream”) comes this 2017 documentary that shows Americans in communities across the country, from Appalachia to the Powder River Basin, as they come to grips with the legacy of the coal industry and what its future should be.

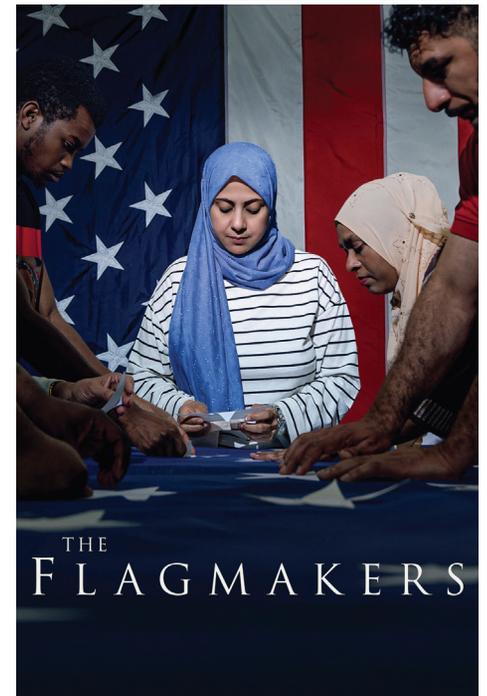

“Positive Energy: Season 1” (Available now)

In this upbeat and informative new documentary series from National Geographic, hosts Dallas Campbell and Kari Byron crisscross the globe to meet and interview innovators who are developing new ways to meet the constantly rising demand for energy with an even more critical need to respect the planet’s environmental issues.

“Muppets Most Wanted” (Available now)

Kermit, a thief? Rest easy: It’s actually a look-alike who’s committing the larceny in this expectedly fun-for-all-ages 2014 comedy, which runs here as a sing-along version. During a European tour, the frog takes the rap for his double and the latter’s sly associate (Ricky Gervais), landing “Kermie” under the watch of an unamused prison guard (Tina Fey). Kermit’s pals eventually come to his rescue.

“The Flagmakers” (Available now)

The question of who the American flag is for is at the heart of this documentary from National Geographic and filmmakers Cynthia Wade and Sharon Liese, which follows employees at Eder Flag in Oak Creek, Wis., as these immigrants, refugees and locals wrestle with identity and belonging while stitching together five million flags a year.
