

In the mid-1600s, before the original colonies were fully settled, French explorers and fur traders became the first Europeans to view the shores of Vermilion. They quickly built a friendly and lucrative trading relationship with the Sioux Indians and later with the Chippewa. This fur trade flourished and led to the French establishing the first port on Lake Vermilion in 1670.

So important was the Duluth-Rainy Lake travel route, it was used as the definition of the international border under the Treaty of Paris in 1763. The northeast shore of Vermilion, and the area that is now Tower, were considered part of Canada while the southwest shore, and what is now the Cook area, were part of the American territory. In 1842, American officials convinced Great Britain that the Grand Portage travel route located to the north was the proper border described by the Treaty of Paris and thus both Lake Vermilion and the Arrowhead region were brought into the United States.

In 1865, deposits of gold along Vermilion were reported by a geological survey team and a gold rush was on. An expedition was sent to cut and clear a crude road from Duluth to the gold fields along a centuries-old route used by the Native Americans. The road they built became known as the Vermilion Trail and is roughly followed by county Road 4 and State Hwy. 135. Mining began in 1866, but after several years of effort, no appreciable amount of gold was found. What was found however, were rich veins of iron ore and by 1882, the town site of Tower was laid out in anticipation of the iron mining industry.
